Subject: I am fundamentally opposed to any policy that would spread radioactive soil throughout the country,

I am fundamentally opposed to any policy that would spread radioactive soil throughout the country, and into communities where people live, work, and play, even if it's low level radiation. This stuff should have never been created, and those who benefited from its creation should bear the burden of the problem we have now.

Because of that belief, I might possibly be convinced that a very limited usage described in the article would be ok if these limitations could be absolutely guaranteed. The limitation is this: That these soils would be placed ONLY at the homes of top executives and stockholders of the companies that made money from the creation of this nuclear waste, and the politicians who voted to allow for this use.

The problem with this solution is that one would have to guarantee that such property is NEVER sold to someone who does not fit into the above mentioned category. It would also be necessary to ensure that only such people who own large tracts of land get the soil and it not be placed anywhere near the border of their property.

I suspect that enforcement of these limitations is impossible, which means no such use of this contaminated soil!!
