Bill.....My recommendation would be to have licensee submit all info except siting etc in one report and package other info in a second companion report and protect the information more from the safeguards angle....thus they meet obligation to get NRC everything and then it is our problem on releasability.....thoughts.....Z

Mike, this is a very gray area right now. The Commission has some criteria before it which will give the staff some general guidance about what type of material should not be released to the public. However, until they vote, the offices have been using their own discretion in making decisions about what goes into PARS. Currently, no substantive documents are being posted to the web page since it is undergoing a systematic review and re-design. Once we receive the criteria, we may also have to decide at a more specific level, agency-wide, which types of documents we will no longer make available. OGC has been involved in this process and they are aware of the situation. For the long term, Margaret Federline's task force may be recommending a new classification scheme for documents which will protect certain "sensitive" materials from release that are not classified today. However, I know that doesn't help you right now. Bottom line, I am assuming NRR management is proceeding business as usual until the criteria have been established. FYI, the NRR folks who have been involved in this "document review" are David Matthews, Alan Madison, John Z. and Bill Reckley.
