Yes, I think event reports may reflect the next phase if we go that far. As for possession limits and contingency plans, I would leave that decision to the experts in NMSS, but I agree they don't meet the threshold of consolidated documents at this point.

1. the Sealed Source and Device registry contains design details about sources and devices and is stand alone document on vulnerabilities of these devices. Remember this registry is also used extensively by agreement states.

2. PRM 73-10 "Nevada petition" about possible terrorist attacks related to spent fuel transportation submitted June 22, 1999

We are evaluating issues related to license files and don't believe that they reach the threshold of stand alone documents such as PIB that Dave Matthews discussed. These files contain possession limits and contingency plans. Any thoughts?

What are we doing with incident reports and events databases as well as inspection reports. We believe they are beyond the scope of this sort. Agreed?
