The Dominion Web site, with regard to the existing North Anna facility, claims that:

(658)

"Continuing studies show that North Anna has very minimal effects on the environment."

Dominion's idea of "very minimal" is probably much higher-impact than most Virginians are comfortable with.

What is "very minimal" tripled? Two more plants would mean three times the environmental impact. Dominion is sure to continue calling this tripled effect "very minimal".

Dominion should be bearing the burden here. Virginians should not have to prove that a more than "minimal" impact on our precious environment would result. We should insist that Dominion bring their "very minimal" detriment to our environment down to zero-impact for the power plant that they ALREADY have before even considering granting permission to build more.

Look at it this way, if you found that a foster parent were abusing the children in her care in a "very minimal" way, would you place more kids with her? Child abuse of any degree or amount is unacceptable. It is the same with damage to our fragile environment. To allow Dominion to proceed with their new plans would be to REWARD them for harming our environment, however "minimally".
