NRC GIVES WEB SITE A NEW LOOK

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission's Web site is taking on an entirely new look. It incorporates the agency's new graphic and tagline – Protecting People and the Environment – and features a less cluttered, public-friendly look. A new Google[®] search engine is also available at the top of every page to make it much easier for site visitors to find NRC documents and Web information.

The new site is being modernized, reorganized and streamlined in two phases. Today marks completion of the first phase that involves changing the graphic on about 40,000 pages of the Web site to capture the new look. The second phase will be completed in about three months and will reflect the final streamlined format with key agency programs featured prominently. The Office of Information Services is working to complete the new design of the Web site before the NRC's Regulatory Information Conference in early March 2007.

“We took a fresh look at our Web site and found it was too cluttered, too dated in its appearance, and not very user-friendly for the public,” said Office of Public Affairs Director Eliot Brenner. “At the request of the Chairman's Office, we compared our site to other regulatory agencies and found it could be made much cleaner, simpler, and more understandable. We believe this new look will help reinforce the agency's mission of ‘protecting people and the environment,’ give the public easier access to information, and perhaps help in our recruiting efforts as the agency grows.”

The following table is designed to help users during the transition to find information that is no longer available from its previous location on the home page. It is available on the Web at: <http://www.nrc.gov/site-help/where-did-it-go.html>. Web questions or problems should be directed to Jeffrey Main at WEBWORK@nrc.gov or 301-415-6845.
