IE INFORMATION NOTICE NO. 82-42: DEFECTS OBSERVED IN PANASONIC MODEL 801 AND MODEL 802 THERMOLUMINESCENT DOSIMETERS

Addressees:

All NRC licensees

Description of Circumstances:

Many licensees use thermoluminescent dosimeters (TLDs) for personnel radiation monitoring. One of the major suppliers of these TLD systems is the Panasonic Industrial Company. It has come to the attention of the NRC that Panasonic Model 801 and Model 802 dosimeters have exhibited a defect that could reduce the response of affected elements. Panasonic has sent a letter to its customers describing the problem and providing actions to be taken in case the defects are found in the customers' dosimeters. A copy of this letter is attached. The purpose of this Information Notice is to inform NRC licensees of the defect and its significance and how to respond if their dosimeters are affected.

Discussion:

In September 1982, during an interlaboratory calibration check, the NRC noted a decrease in the response of a number of the dosimeters which it uses in its TLD Direct Radiation Monitoring Network. Inspection of the dosimeters indicated that the affected elements had bubbles on the carbon-coated polyamide backing material and the aluminum substrate. The bubbles affect the heat transfer and thus the calibration. When these defects were discussed with the manufacturer, NRC staff learned that four other customers had also observed the same defect in their dosimeters. The precise cause of the defect is not yet known with certainty, but the following characteristics have been observed thus far:

1. Affected dosimeters apparently lose sensitivity to a variable degree, thus underestimating radiation exposure. The NRC has observed response reductions as high as a factor of two and other users have reported even greater reductions.
2. The effect appears to occur randomly. Though two dosimeters may be handled identically and have the same production date, one may produce a bubble in one or more elements and the other may not have any.
3. The bubbles usually appear on the carbon-coated polyamide backing material but have also been seen on the aluminum substrate. Changes in element calibration factors may also indicate the presence of a defect; however, bubbles have been observed that have not significantly affected element calibration factors. The bubbles are large and easily seen.

4. The effect has been seen on both lithium borate and calcium sulfate elements, but more frequently on the latter.

Although Panasonic believes that this defect is the result of manufacturing problems at the factory, the possibility that the defect may be reader-related has not been ruled out, because of possible TLD element overheating.

Guidance:

NRC licensees are required to perform personnel radiation monitoring in accordance with 10 CFR 20.202. Licensees who use Panasonic Model 801 or Model 802 TLD systems should verify that their dosimeters continue to respond accurately and should be prepared to take compensatory actions if the defects described herein appear on their dosimeters. Other Panasonic models that employ calcium sulfate elements may also be affected and should be checked as well. The only way to ensure that one's dosimeters are not affected is to visually examine each dosimeter. Therefore, recalibrations and visual examination of dosimeters should be sufficient to identify damaged dosimeters. The dosimeters should be recalibrated whenever bubbles are observed. Where damaged dosimeters are detected, personnel exposure should be re-evaluated using data from undamaged elements or by using other available dosimetry such as self-reading dosimeters.

No written response to this information notice is required. If you need additional information regarding this matter, contact the Administrator of the appropriate NRC Regional Office.

Dear Health Physicist:

Recently four or more than 35 owners of the Panasonic TLD System have notified us that the carbon coated polyamide backing material in the elements of our dosimeters have developed bubble type imperfections. Our factory engineers traced the problem back to the production of the dosimeter inserts. The production environment should be virtually humidity free at this time, however, the air system was shut down at the end of each work shift and the humidity that built up during this time affected the interface between the carbon coated polyamide and the aluminum substrate holding the phosphor. In the heating cycle the element is heated very quickly creating water vapor instantaneously which stresses the layers present in the element structure beyond their limits creating a bubble condition.

Panasonic has analyzed the situation and environmental conditions have been resolved in the production process. Also, a new badge has been developed which contains a single layer where no water could be trapped. This new badge contains a single polyamide/carbon backing which is a new material. There will no longer be an aluminum substrate. These new badges will be completely compatible with the old badges. The target date for the availability of these badges is February 1983.

Panasonic recommends that dosimeters be stored and read in a controlled environment of 50% or less relative humidity. If the dosimeters are worn in a high humidity area especially during the summer months a 12 hour or longer storing period in a 50% relative humidity area before reading is recommended.

Several of the facilities have had some of the 150,000 dosimeters sold for as long as five years without problems. Therefore, this might be an isolated case from one of two production runs. If you find this has happened to your dosimeters, please notify us as soon as possible and we will replace the dosimeters free of charge. We suggest, however, that you wait until the new badges are available before replacement is requested if this is possible.
