IE INFORMATION NOTICE NO. 82-43: DEFICIENCIES IN LWR AIR FILTRATION/
VENTILATION SYSTEMS

Addressees:

All nuclear power reactor facilities holding an operating license (OL) or construction permit (CP).

Purpose:

This information notice is provided as notification of events that had actual or potential radiological impact on the plant environs. It is expected that recipients will review the information for applicability to their facilities. No specific action or response is required.

Description of Circumstances:

Within the past 2-1/2 years, air filtration/ventilation systems at five facilities were found to have serious deficiencies, ranging from overloaded prefilters to evidence of a wetted high-efficiency particulate air (HEPA) filter bank, to penetration of HEPA filter banks by substantive quantities of radioactive resin beads. Deficiencies occurred in both safety-related and non-safety-related systems.

In June 1982, radioactive spent resin was found on the grounds and roof areas at Pilgrim 1. Principal radionuclides were Co-60, Cs-137, Cs-134, and Mn-54; contamination ranged from 20,000 dpm/100 cm<sup>2</sup> to 100,000 dpm/100 cm<sup>2</sup>. The contamination penetrated damaged filters in a non-safety-grade HEPA filter plenum. The degraded condition of these filters was not detected in a timely manner because of a lack of surveillance or testing of the filtration system. The HEPA filter failure occurred possibly as an end result of a combination of high dust loadings and mechanical damage resulting from the impact of disintegrating prefilters, as well as the probable warping or distortion of HEPA filter frames under prolonged exposure to water and high humidity.

In December 1980, the SGTS trains at Brunswick 1 were found to be operating at close to 100% humidity, and condensation was observed on the interior walls. Regulatory Guide 1.52 recommends operation at humidity of 70% or less; operation at high humidity is known to cause substantial degradation of the iodine-retention capacity of charcoal adsorbers. Also, in December 1980, both filter trains in the turbine building filter system at Brunswick were found to be operating with the upstream HEPA differential pressure gauges offscale high. Also, in the turbine building filter system, 43% of the upstream HEPA filters were improperly installed.

In August 1980, filters and charcoal adsorbers in the Surry 1 process vent exhaust air treatment system were determined to have been half submerged in water, and the HEPA filters were caked with dust. No pressure drop instrumentation was provided across the filter banks to ascertain their state of loading. Also, in August 1980, pressure drop gauges across the HEPA filter banks in the ventilation exhaust treatment system of the auxiliary building at Surry 1 exceeded 5 inches, which is offscale high; this condition had existed since May 1980.

In May 1980, the normal containment building exhaust filters at Turkey Point were found to be overloaded with dust to such an extent that the filter medium was separated from its frame in more than 50% of the filters. This apparently allowed radioactive contamination resulting from explosive plugging of steam generator tubes to be transported to the southeast sector of the plant site.

In March 1980, it was determined that HEPA filters in the Big Rock Point offgas and chemistry laboratory exhaust treatment systems were not being tested for leakage in place. No records were maintained of pressure differential across the laboratory HEPA filters which had not been replaced for at least five years.

In each case described above, licensees initiated programs and procedures to correct the deficiencies and to prevent or minimize their potential for reoccurrence.

Air treatment systems which incorporate filtration or adsorption media are provided to reduce the potential release of radioactive materials to the environs. In order to function as designed, such systems should be installed, tested, and maintained to a degree consistent with their intended function.

Guidance on installation, maintenance, and testing programs, of a degree and nature which have been demonstrated to ensure proper system functioning, is provided in Regulatory Guides 1.52 and 1.140.

No written response to this information notice is required. If you need additional information about this matter, please contact the Regional Administrator of the appropriate NRC Regional Office or this office.
