Good morning,

At about 9:33 (ET) this morning I was listening to the RIC 2017 morning session and heard, once again, that NRC staff people are worried about less advancement prospects in this time of employee reductions. How useful to us, (the public), are professional employees so isolated from life that they think, once hired, they are entitled to continuous advancement despite significant staff employment reductions?

How about this thought? Instead of expecting a promotion as a right, why not consider that a promotion might be earned by any employee applying personal effort (on their own personal time) to improve their skills, knowledges, and abilities beyond what training they are paid to take by their employer?

Additionally, maybe it is time to see that too much "working" from home leads to too much isolation.

I do not think that the NRC is obligated to continually promote staff people who feel it is time for them to get another (unearned?) promotion.

Thank you,

Tom Gurdziel
