The U.S. Department of Energy's "consent-based siting" for the interim storage of nuclear waste from plants like San Onofre, proposes to create temporary waste sites in regions of the country that need the business such activity would produce. Not a good idea in my opinion.

It is an interim solution to the interim solution that's already been in place at San Onofre over fifty years, and it would take decades and billions of dollars to find, approve and build the new sites and transport the nuclear waste to them. And additional decades and millions to decommission those sites, and again transport the waste when permanent single or multiple repositories are established. Why the duplication of effort time and money? Instead, why not concentrate our resources on finding the permanent solution and prepare the nuclear waste now in the best possible manner for eventual safe transport and storage?

Besides, isn't there a moral and ethical aspect in having our most economically disadvantaged communities "consent" to accept for money what is unacceptable to the rest of us?
