By refusing to review the Appeal Board's decision in this case, the Commission has again lost an opportunity to provide much needed guidance to the agency's adjudicatory boards and staff. NRC's inspections of licensed facilities play a crucial role in assuring the safe construction and operation of such facilities. The success of these inspections sometimes depends upon information provided by the employees of the licensees and their contractors, and in those cases, these employees are often willing to provide information to NRC's inspectors only in confidence. This case makes it clear that a coherent policy is needed which strikes a reasonable balance between protecting sources of information and the public's right of access to safety information. The Commission should itself decide that policy rather than allow it to develop haphazardly.
